

Section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962

Background

On February 16, 2018, the Department of Commerce (Commerce) published its investigations into the national security implications of U.S. imports of steel and aluminum. In each case, Commerce determined that current imports threaten to impair national security. Such investigations are carried out pursuant to Sec. 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 (19 U.S.C. § 1862, as amended).

Section 232 is sometimes called the “national security clause,” because it provides the President with the ability to impose restrictions on imports that Commerce determines threaten to impair the national security. In 2001, under the last Section 232 investigation, Commerce found that imports of iron ore and finished steel did not pose a national security threat.

Section 232 Process

Section 232 allows any department or agency head, or any “interested party”, to request Commerce to initiate an investigation to ascertain the effect of specific imports on the national security of the United States. Commerce may also self-initiate an investigation.

Investigation. Once a Section 232 investigation is requested in writing, Commerce must “immediately initiate an appropriate investigation to determine the effects on the national security” of the subject imports. After consulting with the Secretary of Defense, other “appropriate officers of the United States,” and the public, if appropriate, Commerce has 270 days from the initiation date to prepare a report advising the President whether the targeted product is being imported “in certain quantities or under such circumstances” to impair U.S. national security, and to provide recommendations for action or inaction based on the findings.

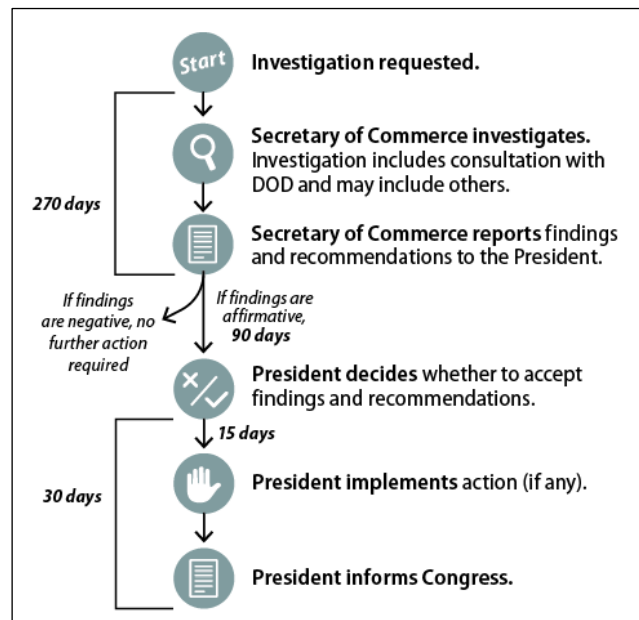

The Bureau of Industry and Security (BIS) at Commerce conducts the investigation based on federal regulations codified in 15 CFR § 705 (Effect of Imported Articles on the National Security). In terms of national security, Commerce considers: (1) existing domestic production of the product; (2) future capacity needed; (3) the manpower, raw materials, production equipment, facilities, and other supplies needed to meet projected national defense requirements; (4) growth requirements, including the investment, exploration, and development to meet them; and (5) any other relevant factors.

Regarding the subject imports, Commerce must consider: (1) the impact of foreign competition on the domestic industry deemed essential for national security; (2) the effects that the “displacement of domestic products” cause, including substantial unemployment, decreases in public revenue, loss of investment, special skills, or production capacity; and (3) any other relevant factors that are causing, or will cause a weakening in the national economy. Public notices of the initiation, requests for public comment, and an Executive Summary of the final report (excluding any confidential or classified material) must be published in the Federal Register. Hearings may be held, if appropriate.

Presidential Action and Notification. If Commerce finds in the negative, Commerce informs the President and no further action is required. If Commerce determines in the affirmative, the President, upon receipt of the report, has 90 days to (1) determine whether he concurs with its findings; and (2) if the President concurs, determine the nature and duration of the action to be taken to adjust the subject imports. The President may decide to impose tariffs or quotas to offset the adverse effect, without any limits on the duration on tariff or quota amounts. The President has discretion to exclude specific product categories, countries, or provide other exemptions. After making a determination, the President must implement the action within 15 days, and submit a written statement to Congress explaining the actions or inaction within 30 days. The President must also publish his determination in the Federal Register.

Section 232 Actions

Prior to the Trump Administration, 26 Section 232 national security investigations were initiated, beginning in 1963. Previous investigations of manufactured goods were more tightly focused on specific products, including antifriction bearings and gears and gearing products. Of the 26 cases initiated (excluding investigations currently underway), Commerce made negative determinations 62% of the time. When Commerce made positive determinations, the President recommended action 5 times (Figure 2). These determinations and actions were all related to petroleum products or crude oil. One of these actions, a conservation fee added to petroleum products, was held illegal by a federal court. Of the remaining 4 actions, 2 were based on the Mandatory Oil Import Program, an initiative that predated enactment of Section 232. Therefore, some commentators state that only 2 actions derived from positive determinations reached in Section 232 investigations. Those actions were an embargo on crude oil from Iran in 1979, and an embargo on crude oil from Libya in 1982.

Trump Administration and Section 232

Commerce initiated its steel investigation on April 19 (82 FR 19205) and its aluminum investigation on April 26, 2017 (82 FR 21509). Commerce sent both reports to the President on January 22, 2018, and released redacted versions in February.

In each investigation, Commerce analyzed current and future requirements for national defense and 16 specific critical infrastructure sectors. In each case, Commerce determined that the present quantities and circumstance of imports threaten to impair the national security as defined in Section 232 and provided recommendations for implementing tariffs and/or quotas. The President must decide on a course of action by April 11, 2018, for steel imports, and by April 19 for aluminum imports.

Secretary of Commerce Wilbur Ross is also reportedly considering initiating additional investigations into other specific imports such as uranium.

How Does Section 232 Differ from Other Trade Enforcement Tools?

Section 232 is one of several tools that the United States has at its disposal to address unfair trade practices. For example, the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA, 50 U.S.C. § 1702) grants the President broad authority to act in cases of national emergency.

Section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. § 2252 et seq.) addresses import surges of fairly traded goods. Rather than focusing on national security, however, Section 201 investigations, conducted by the U.S. International Trade Commission (USITC), are industry-focused, temporary, and based on helping the U.S. industry return to health. Presidential action is also required in Section 201.

Other trade remedies address unfairly traded goods; for example, antidumping (AD, 19 U.S.C. §1673 et seq.) and countervailing duty (CVD, 19 U.S.C. §1671 et seq.) laws authorize the imposition of duties if (1) the International Trade Administration of the Department of Commerce (ITA) determines that imports of a product are being, or are likely to be, sold in the United States at less-than-fair value, or that an imported product is being subsidized by the government or any public entity; and (2) the USITC determines that an industry in the United States is materially injured or threatened with material injury due to imports of that merchandise. In AD and CVD cases, the remedy is an additional duty calculated to offset the amount of dumping or subsidy. Presidential action is not required.

Policy Implications

The Commerce and Defense Departments have broad discretion in Section 232 cases to define the scope of the investigation. Some observers are concerned that this discretion could create a slippery slope as to what products are considered to have “national security” implications. They assert that too broad a definition could lead to retaliation or imitation by trading partners who invoke national security to limit or block market access to U.S. exports. However, since most investigations to date have ended with negative determinations, this assertion has not proven to be true in a practical sense.

While unilateral action may appear to be counter to U.S. trade liberalization commitments under the World Trade Organization (WTO) agreements, Article XXI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), allows WTO members to take measures in order to protect “essential security interests.” Nonetheless, U.S. actions under Section 232 could be challenged under WTO dispute settlement procedures. However, the WTO does not specifically define the security term, and WTO members have asserted broad authority to interpret this provision.

Issues for Congress

The Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution (Article 1, Section 8, Clause 3) gives Congress the power “to regulate Commerce with foreign Nations.” Under Section 232, Congress delegated some of this authority to the President. Congress could exercise its authority by conducting oversight of ongoing Section 232 investigations. Congress could also hold hearings on the U.S. steel or aluminum industries, or on other import-sensitive industries.

While some in Congress may view Section 232 as an effective means to address trade-related national security concerns, others may not agree with potential trade restrictive actions. When a controversy arose in 1980 over the President’s remedy on petroleum products, Congress amended the law so that passage of a resolution of disapproval would nullify any presidential action on petroleum (19 U.S.C. 1862(f)). Congress could consider amending paragraph (f) to broaden the scope of products subject to a disapproval resolution.
